Institute of ... Child-centered play therapy follows the theoretical constructs of client-centered therapy, now referred to as person-centered therapy, formulated by Carl Rogers (1951). Virginia Axline, a student and later a colleague of Rogers, applied these principles to children and created what is commonly known as child-centered play therapy—a way of being with children rather than doing something to or for children. Child-centered play therapy. - APA PsycNET Play Therapy is a form of child counselling for children from ages 3 through 11-12. Because the child's world of play is their natural way of communicating, the play therapist enters their play world to communicate with them and to help them understand and resolve any psychological and psychosocial challenges e.g. trauma, separation of parents, loss of a loved one, chronic illness, etc. Child-Centered Play Therapy | ChildPlayWorks Therapy through play is a counseling method used to help children communicate their inner experiences through the use of toys and play. Therapy through play is also called child-centered therapy and/or play therapy and is a non-pathologizing technique based on the belief that children have the internal drive to achieve wellness. Child-Centered Therapy — Wellness & Courage Child-centered Play Therapy, originated by Virginia Axline as Nondirective Play Therapy, is an approach that emphasizes the provision of therapeutic conditions for children to naturally open up and express themselves fully through their own language - play. Empirical studies Five-day Basic Training on Child-centered Play Therapy According to Axline, child centered play therapy focused on the child, not on the child's presenting problem. Like Rogers before her, she promoted a therapeutic relationship based on genuineness, authenticity, unconditional positive regard, acceptance and empathic understanding of the client in order to support psychological development and growth.
